I can't help but compare it to this current week, the one in which my car is dying - but on a lesser degree. Cue laughter. This car - it took us on journeys. It made memories for us. It's a 2001 Subaru Forester that carted me around in my senior year of high school. It carried me to college for the first time and brought me back home at times when I just needed my mum. It heard our mother-daughter radio duets (to Lady Gaga and Cher) now turned solos. I transported her to chemotherapy in it, and she later gave it to me after my Impreza was totaled when struck in 2012. I recognized the car as "her" when I'd see it in my rearview mirror or as it pulled into my apartment driveway or work parking lot. My favorite adventures include my mum, who taught me to drive, behind its wheel.

My sentimental side is battling with my frugal side. I know it's most likely a smarter, better-bang-for-your-buck plan to funnel my funds into a new, used car than repair this one. I've replaced both its rear wheel bearings in the last two years, and the car is plagued with weeping head gaskets. I'm disappointed that at 155,000 miles it didn't reach 200,000 like my last two Subarus - and most Subarus in general - did. If I was wealthy, I would repair it forever.

Torn on what to do, I asked Mum for a sign. I'd been researching newer, used Foresters, feeling guilty looking at them. I guess I just wanted her permission to let it go.

Last Saturday evening I headed out to a friend's house to carve pumpkins. I turned the ignition on and chalked up the lack of headlights to my husband who had driven the car earlier to unload leaves at the landfill. Flicking the light lever back and forth didn't illuminate my garage but instead, me, realizing its lights had burned out - or so I thought. It's likely a fuse problem because my high beams work. Regardless, I had my sign. I laughed out loud and felt relief wash over me.

For Mother's Day in 2012, I wrote a column about Mum and called her my North Star, "Always present no matter the weather, illuminating the way for me, never burning out." Those words couldn't hold more true today. My car's lights didn't burn out, but they've gone out. And she has illuminated a path for me to take, enlightening me with permission to let go of her car. My North Star, indeed.

Happy Thanksgiving
