date back to the early 2000s."

The new cameras will replace the old ones, therefore not requiring new wiring in those areas. The ten additional cameras will require new wiring to be put in to install them.

These cameras will monitor different "hot spots" in the city as well as key entrances and exits.

"We're just trying to cover all of the exits and entry points," Pratt said.

The hope is that with increased monitoring it will deter criminal activity as the police will have an easier time identifying and tracking people who committed crimes.

"A call comes in at whatever location and boom, we'll be able to look right through the cameras to see, probably even before anyone is even able to get there, what is going on in that area," Pratt said.

These cameras will work in conjunction with Shot Spotter, according to Pratt. When Shot Spotter goes off the cameras in the area will automatically zoom in on the identified location where the shots went off.

"The cameras will zoom in to that pinpointed area on Shot Spotter so you can see who is in that area," Pratt said. "Ideally, if it happens you're going to see the people on camera that were involved."

City Councilor Kevin Jourdain especially approved this aspect of the cameras, as he feels it is a good addition to the Shot Spotter system.

"I think this is what we would call phase two of our Shot Spotter technology initiative, which I think is fantastic," Jourdain said. "It's what we want."

The cameras will be monitored by officers on dispatch and in the station, though someone will not be monitoring the cameras all the time.

However, as incidents come in the cameras will be able to store their recordings so the police can rewind the tapes to track recordings to the time of a crime.

"If something happens we can go back, watch the film over and over and pull whatever video we need from that," Pratt said.

Therefore, even if someone is not watching the cameras when an incident occurs, they can rewind to view what was recorded when the incident happened.

Pratt also said that these cameras will be high quality enough that they will be able to zoom in on and identify individuals in view.

Additionally, Pratt noted that these cameras will not be able to do plate readings.

The finance committee voted unanimously to recommend this transfer of funds to the full city council so that these cameras can be installed.

Jourdain especially was enthusiastic about the potential of the new cameras.

"We just crank up the level of scrutiny on the bad guys to a point where they're like 'it isn't worth doing business in Holyoke' and get them the hell out of here," Jourdain said.
